

To Whom it may concern:

I live in Indiana and I'm proud to tell my out of state friends about the tough anti-telemarketing laws we have here. It has been so wonderful to come home and eat supper and enjoy my evening with the family with out continous interruption by telemarketers. I am a very decent, hard working, law abiding, and taxpaying person. However, when a telemarketer invades my privacy by calling my home and trying to force sell his products or services to me, well it turns me into a verbally violent individual. If I want these peoples goods or services, I'll seek them out. Why can't they do like everyone else and advirtise. I have not gotten any calls compared to at least 10 or 12 per week since I got on Indiana's list. If you want to find out how much people hate telemarketers than, put that choice on the next national election ballot. Telemarketers or not. The result would be a resonding NOT! The Federal Government should adopt Indiana's law just as it is. Keep these people out of my home and my families life. It is an invasion of privacy.
